FALL 2017

LAW OFFICES

Caffarelli & Associates LIMITED

News and Information for Clients and Friends

TRUMP APPOINTEES FILLING THE BENCH

The country is over 200 days into the current administration. With so many important issues dominating the headlines, it has been easy to miss the start of what may turn out to be one of the most important legacies of this presidency. Donald Trump has moved quickly in trying to fill federal court vacancies, and has already nominated more federal judges than any of his immediate predecessors so early into their tenures.

There are currently over 130 judicial vacancies to fill on the federal courts - an unusually high number largely due to Republicans blocking dozens of President Obama's appointees in the last years of the previous administration. Now in control of all branches of government, Republicans have the opportunity to stack the judiciary. So far, Trump has focused his nominations and promotions on very conservative, mostly young individuals who - if confirmed - would shape jurisprudence for a generation. To date, eight of Trump's 44 federal judge nominations have been confirmed, including Supreme Court Justice Neil Gorsuch. The remaining confirmations include one District Court judge and three Circuit Court judges, in addition to three confirmations to the Veterans Claims Court.

Of course, Gorsuch's confirmation as the 101st Supreme Court justice deservedly received the most media attention. Many legal media outlets have ranked Gorsuch among the most conservative of justices to ever sit on the Court, placing him to the right of even his predecessor Antonin Scalia. Gorsuch is likely to have a tremendous impact on labor and employment cases – and not, likely, to the benefit of employee rights and protections.

Based on his record in the Tenth Circuit, Gorsuch appears to rely almost exclusively upon his interpretation of statutory language, and rejects expansive views of employment laws and administrative agencies' authority. His written opinions paint a portrait of a judge who does not defer to administrative agencies' views of regulations or to agencies' interpretation of federal statutes. This became quite clear during his confirmation hearings, as he answered questions about his controversial dissent in TransAm Trucking, Inc. v. DOL Administrative Review Board.

We look on with bated breath to see how his – and other Trump appointees' – interpretations of employment and consumer protection laws affect employee and consumer rights moving forward.

On a recent family trip, Alejandro Caffarelli captured this view of the Wesleyan Chapel in Seneca Falls, NY, home of the first women's rights convention in 1848.

In this Issue...

C&A DEFEATS KEY MOTION TO DISMISS IN TITLE VII, FMLA CASE

A federal judge recently refused to dismiss Noemi Valdivia's claims against her former employer, a suburban school district. Ms. Valdivia began working as a secretary for Township High School District 214 in 2010. Following her transfer to a new school within the district in July 2016, Ms. Valdivia began crying uncontrollably at work and told her principal that she was unsure whether she could continue working and that she was losing weight, unable to sleep, and unable to eat. In response, her principal urged her to decide between resigning or continuing to work. Unaware of any other options, Ms. Valdivia resigned in August 2016. Later that month, Ms. Valdivia was hospitalized and diagnosed, for the first time, with depression, anxiety, insomnia, and panic disorder.

In late 2016, Caffarelli & Associates filed a complaint on Ms. Valdivia's behalf alleging that the district knew or should have known that she likely had a serious health condition such that it should have advised her of her right to leave under the Family and Medical Leave Act. A later amended complaint also included a claim for violations of Title VII based on racially derogatory comments to which Ms. Valdivia was subjected during her employment. The school district moved to dismiss both counts, arguing with respect to the FMLA claim that it could not have been on notice of Ms. Valdivia's potential need for leave since even she was unaware of her conditions at the time of her resignation.

The district court denied the motion in its entirety. In so doing, the court rejected Defendant's argument that because Ms. Valdivia herself was not aware of her medical conditions during her employment, the district could not be expected to know either, and therefore did not have notice of a potential need for leave. Instead, the court found that Ms. Valdivia's behavior, as alleged in the complaint, was so unusual and such a departure from her typical behavior that it potentially put the district on notice that she was suffering from a serious health condition. The court also noted that in some circumstances, the employee is excused from giving explicit notice of her health condition where a mental health condition such as depression "may prevent her from communicating the nature of her illness."

Discovery in Valdivia v. Township High School District 214 is proceeding.

ARE EMPLOYMENT CLASS ACTIONS HEADED TOWARD AN EPIC FAIL?

By Alejandro Caffarelli [1]

In the 2016 case of Lewis v. Epic Systems Corp.,[2] the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that class action waivers in employee arbitration agreements violate the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA")[3] in that they hinder an employee's right to engage in protected, concerted activity. The Court reasoned that such agreements are not subject to mandatory arbitration under the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA")[4] because they are subject to the FAA savings clause, which, among other things, voids "illegal" arbitration agreements. In the 2017-18 term, the United States Supreme Court will hear Epic Systems' appeal, which was consolidated with Ernst & Young v. Morris[5] and National Labor Relations Board v. Murphy Oil USA, Inc.,[6] two other cases that also analyzed the interplay between the FAA and the NLRA. Among lawyers who represent employees, the outcome is highly anticipated. Not just because it will be the first FAA case decided by Justice Gorsuch, but also because it could be a turning point in employment law class action jurisprudence, significantly shifting the balance of power between labor and management.

The Evolution of the FAA – a Tool for Business Becomes a Weapon

In 1925, the FAA was enacted in response to judicial hostility to the private arbitration of commercial disputes. And in the following decades, application of the FAA was principally limited to inter-corporate contracts and other transactions. In the mid-1980s, however, employers began inserting mandatory arbitration clauses into employment agreements. At first blush, the FAA contains a clause that appears to exclude employment cases. Section 1 states that "nothing herein contained shall apply to contracts of employment of seamen, railroad employees, or any other class of workers engaged in foreign or interstate commerce."[7] Given the Supreme Court's historically broad application of the term "interstate commerce" as it pertains the to Commerce Clause in the U.S. Constitution, it seems logical that the FAA would not apply to any employment cases. Every worker engages in "commerce" (as defined by Congress). But in 1991, the Supreme Court in Gilmer v. Interstate/ Johnson Lane Corp. indeed applied the FAA to an employment case, ruling that an employee was required to arbitrate his age discrimination claim.[8]

Although there was some initial ambiguity due to the fact that the contract in Gilmer involved an employment agency, the Supreme Court erased all doubt in 2001 by holding in Circuit City Stores, Inc. v. Adams that the FAA applied to all contracts of employment, except those involving workers who (like seamen and railroad workers) were engaged in transportation across state lines.[9] The Supreme Court's interpretation of Section 1 in Circuit City was quite curious, since Section 2 clearly states that the entire scope of the FAA is limited to contracts "evidencing a transaction involving commerce." Apparently, "commerce" as defined in Section 1 is not the same "commerce" as defined in Section 2. This is not surprising. As most advocates for employees have become painfully aware over the past few decades, it seems that management gets to toss the arbitration coin and the rules according to the Supreme Court always appear to be "heads I win, tails you lose."

The service industry and employers across the country quickly took notice of the Supreme Court's leanings, so from the 1990s on, mandatory arbitration clauses became omnipresent—embedded in the fine print in a broad range of industries: from cable television and credit cards to education, telecommunications, and internet service providers. Most online transactions that require a user to "click to accept" typically contain an arbitration clause. In the employment context, arbitration clauses are usually tucked into the packet of employment materials most new hires sign when starting a new job. Because arbitration clauses are usually incorporated into larger agreements or described as a positive thing (who on earth could oppose fast, easy, and fair dispute resolution!?) many people who are subject to arbitration clauses do not even realize that they exist, much less understand their true impact. These "agreements" are referred to as mandatory or forced arbitration because a consumer who does not agree will be denied the product or service, and applicants for employment will simply not be hired. An employee thus has no real choice or ability to reject or negotiate the applicability or terms of arbitration. And as a practical matter, most new hires are simply relieved to get a job, and would rightfully conclude that challenging a new employer's policies on or before their first day is not a good career move.

Flush from their successes banishing individual consumers and employees from the courthouse, business set its sights on a much bigger fish, the de facto elimination of class actions. Class actions are the best vehicle to protect large numbers of people from individually small but cumulatively significant damages that would be inefficient or too costly to pursue on an individual basis. Thus, class action waivers started appearing in consumer contracts and, more recently, in employment contracts.

In 2011, the Supreme Court finally addressed class action waivers in AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, a consumer case.[10] In Concepcion, an AT&T customer brought a class action alleging that the company had engaged in fraudulent practices by charging $15-per-phone sales taxes to customers promised "free" cell phones as an incentive to sign a service contract. It was hardly the type of damages that would motivate a customer to file an individual claim, but in the aggregate likely resulted in thousands, if not millions, of dollars for the benefit of AT&T.

AT&T's customer agreement included an arbitration clause containing a class action waiver. The plaintiff argued that the class-action waiver was unconscionable given the low value of individual claims. The Ninth Circuit agreed and, after applying a California statutory rule to determine whether a class action waiver is unconscionable,[11] denied AT&T's motion to compel arbitration on an individual basis. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the California rule was preempted because it specifically targeted and thus "interfered with" arbitration.

Justice Scalia, writing for the majority, disparaged the use of class arbitration and expressed his distaste for class actions generally, stating that class arbitrations impose unacceptable risks for defendants, who could face a significant judgment when numerous small claims were aggregated and yet would lose their right to judicial review. Scalia concluded that "[a]rbitration is poorly suited to the higher stakes of class litigation."

Some lower courts initially limited the Concepcion holding to consumer cases, but over time, most courts extended it to encompass employment cases. Moreover, although the Concepcion case was about preemption of a specific state law, many courts have read it more broadly to disallow all challenges to class-action waivers on the basis of unconscionability.

In June 2013, the Supreme Court took another bite at the issue in American Express Co. v. Italian Colors Restaurant.[12] The case involved a class action brought by a group of merchants alleging that their American Express contracts violated the Sherman Antitrust Act. American Express moved to compel individual arbitration based upon the class action waiver, and the district court granted the motion. The merchants contended that arbitration of the antitrust claim on an individual basis would be extremely complicated and cost hundreds of thousands of dollars for an average recovery of only about $5,000. In a nutshell, the merchants argued that without the ability to bring a class or collective action, they would de facto lose their ability to "effectively vindicate" their substantive rights.

The Supreme Court upheld the class-action waiver and Justice Scalia, again writing for the majority, seemingly shut the door on the effective-vindication doctrine. He called the doctrine "dicta," and that, at most, it might apply to "filing and administrative fees attached to arbitration that are so high as to make access to the forum impracticable." Scalia added, "the fact that it is not worth the expense involved in proving a statutory remedy does not constitute the elimination of the right to pursue that remedy." Justice Kagan delivered a scathing dissent, arguing that "[t]he monopolist gets to use its monopoly power to insist on a contract effectively depriving its victims of all legal recourse" and that without the effective-vindication doctrine, companies have every incentive to draft their agreements to extract backdoor waivers of statutory rights."[13]

Although Italian Colors involved a commercial dispute between merchants and a credit card processing company, the majority's decision has significant consequences for employment cases, which often involve smaller amounts of individual damages that may be uniformly incurred by a large number of employees. By narrowing the effective-vindication doctrine, the Court continued to undermine challenges to class-action waivers in arbitration clauses.

The Seventh Circuit Draws a Line

With the Concepcion and Italian Colors decisions percolating through the lower courts, and few practitioners believing that employment class actions waivers would be treated any differently than consumer class action waivers, the National Labor Relations Board issued In re D.R. Horton, Inc. ("Horton I").[14] In Horton I and subsequent decisions,[15] the Board took the position that class action waivers in employment cases violated the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA") and were thus unenforceable. The premise underlying the Board's decision was that the FAA conflicted with the NLRA's guarantee that employees had an absolute right to engage in concerted, protected activity—one that could not be waived as a matter of law and that such activity included filing and participating in class action lawsuits. Unfortunately, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals did not agree and in D.R. Horton Inc. v. NLRB ("Horton II") denied enforcement of the Board's Order.[16] The Fifth Circuit was later joined by the Second and Eighth Circuits, which also held that class waivers in employment cases are enforceable.

District courts across the country mostly fell in line with Horton II until mid-2016, when the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals issued the Epic decision. Epic was authored by Chief Judge Diane

ARE EMPLOYMENT CLASS ACTIONS HEADED TOWARD AN EPIC FAIL? CONT.

Wood, a highly-respected jurist who was interviewed by President Obama for a position on the Supreme Court.[17] In Epic, the Seventh Circuit criticized the Fifth Circuit in Horton II for "mak[ing] no effort to harmonize the FAA and NLRA." Noting that illegality is a ground preventing enforcement of an arbitration provision under the FAA's saving clause, Epic held that "[b]ecause ... [a class action waiver] ... is unlawful under Section 7 of the NLRA, it is illegal, and meets the criteria of the FAA's saving clause for non-enforcement." Epic thus insisted that the FAA and NLRA "be harmonized ... [as] according to all the traditional rules of statutory construction, they must be ... through the FAA's saving clause."

The Seventh Circuit's Epic analysis focused on what it described as the substantive rights underlying Section 7 of the NLRA, which "provides that '[e]mployees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.'"[18] Adding that "both courts and the [NLRB] have held that filing a collective or class action suit constitutes 'concerted activit[y]' under Section 7," the Seventh Circuit confirmed that "[t]he NLRA's history and purpose confirm that the phrase 'concerted activities' in Section 7 should be read broadly to include resort to representative, joint, collective or class legal remedies."

Epic also held that Section 7 rights are substantive, and "not ... merely [] procedural . . . ." Although the Fifth Circuit had reached the opposite conclusion with regard to class action procedures under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23, the Seventh Circuit distinguished the authority cited in Horton II—stating that "just as the NLRA is not Rule 23," it is not comparable to those statutory schemes that do not themselves guarantee a right to take concerted action.

Referring to the text of the NLRA itself, the Seventh Circuit concluded that the right to take collective action could not be merely procedural because "Section 7 is the NLRA's only substantive provision," and "concerted activity aimed at improving wages, hours or working conditions through litigation or arbitration lies at the core of the rights protected by Section 7." It stressed that the rights guaranteed by Section 7 covered not only collective bargaining, "but also "employees' 'right to ... engage in other concerted activities for ... other mutual aid or protection.'" On August 22, 2016, the Seventh Circuit was joined by the Ninth Circuit, which held that Section 7 of the NLRA establishes a substantive right to concerted activity and, thus, renders class action waivers in employment contracts unenforceable.[19]

Epic at the Supreme Court, and the Future of Class Action Waivers

Epic is now at the Supreme Court, with oral argument currently scheduled for October 2, 2017. Both Concepcion and Italian Colors were 5-4 decisions in which now-deceased Justice Scalia cast a deciding vote. If the Supreme Court determines that the rights guaranteed by the NLRA are procedural, it is likely that the votes of the remaining eight justices in Epic will mirror their votes in those two cases—giving newly-appointed Justice Gorsuch the swing vote. Justice Scalia was the driving force behind Concepcion and Italian Colors, and his absence will deprive class action foes of a forceful and vociferous advocate. Needless to say, it will be interesting to see how Scalia's absence impacts the Court's analysis of the Federal Arbitration Act.

In light of the new power dynamic on the Supreme Court, counsel for Lewis should keep a tight focus on the unique interplay between the FAA and the NLRA, and be prepared to distinguish Concepcion and other recent Supreme Court precedent without criticizing it. That will mean pointing out that the offensive law in Concepcion was a state rule, and therefore the underlying issue was at the core one of federal preemption. In contrast, the NLRA is a federal statute, which contrary to state laws, must be harmonized with other federal laws such as the FAA. As a federal statute, the NLRA cannot be "preempted" by another federal statute. It will also be necessary to address the Supreme Court's driving concern in Concepcion—that the California rule at issue was hostile to arbitration by design, whereas the NLRA focuses on concerted activity, and that it otherwise embraces and encourages arbitration in the context of labor relations.

And finally, preserving employment class actions means moving away from Horton I, minimizing any reliance on the Chevron doctrine of deferring to administrative interpretations, and basing the analysis on the Supreme Court's own statutory interpretation of the NLRA to define class and collective actions as types of statutorily protected activity. It has been well documented that Gorsuch appears to be a skeptic of Chevron deference.[20] As recently as 2016, Judge Gorsuch specifically dissented to argue against deferring to the NLRB in NLRB v. Community Health Services, Inc.[21] In her opinion, Judge Wood in Epic focused instead on traditional rules of statutory interpretation, Supreme Court precedent interpreting the key provisions of the NLRA, and the statutory language itself—not the NLRB's position or Horton I. In light of the current composition of the Supreme Court, counsel for Lewis would be well advised to follow Judge Wood's lead and focus on the NLRA text.

[1] A version of this article was previously published in Just Resolutions, the electronic newsletter for the American Bar Association Section of Dispute Resolution.
[2] Lewis v. Epic Systems Corp., 823 F.3d 1147 (7th Cir. 2016).
[3] 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.
[4] 9 U.S.C. § 1 et seq.
[5] Sutherland v. Ernst & Young LLP, 726 F.3d 290 (2d Cir. 2013).
[6] Murphy Oil USA, Inc. v. NLRB, 808 F.3d 1013 (5th Cir. 2015).
[7] 9 U.S.C. § 1.
[8] Gilmer v. Interstate/Johnson Lane Corp., 500 U.S. 20 (1991).
[9] Circuit City Stores, Inc. v. Adams, 532 U.S. 105 (2001).
[10] AT&T Mobility v. Concepcion, 563 U.S. 333 (2011).
[11] California's three prong test looks to whether (1) the agreement is a contract of adhesion, (2) the dispute is likely to involve small amounts of damages, and (3) the party with superior bargaining power took advantage of a large numbers of consumers. Laster v. AT & T Mobility LLC, 584 F.3d 849, 854 (9th Cir. 2009).
[12] American Express Co. v. Italian Colors Restaurant, 133 S. Ct. 2304 (2013).
[13] Id. at 2315.
[14] In re D.R. Horton Inc., 357 NLRB No. 184, 2012 WL 36274 at *17 (2012) (enf. denied in part, 737 F.3d 344 (5th Cir. 2013)).
[15] See e.g., Murphy Oil USA Inc., 361 NLRB No. 72, 2014 WL 5465454 (2014), (enf. den., 808 F.3d 1013 (5th Cir. 2015)); Ralphs Grocery Company and Terri Brown, 363 NLRB No. 128, 2016 WL 737041 (2016).
[16] D.R. Horton Inc. v. NLRB, 737 F.3d 344, 358-362 (5th Cir. 2013).
[17] http://www.abajournal.com/news/article/obama_interviews_7th_circuit_judge_diane_wood_for_potential_supreme_court_n/.
[18] Epic Systems, 823 F.3d at 1151 (quoting 29 U.S.C. § 157).
[19] Morris v. Ernst & Young, LLP, 834 F.3d 975 (9th Cir. 2016).
[20] http://www.scotusblog.com/2017/03/roots-limits-gorsuchs-views-chevron-deference/.
[21] 812 F.3d 768 (10th Cir. 2016) (Gorsuch, J., dissenting).